Question74:-Answer the questions below the paragraph :

"The desire to stop time is either a fundamental feature or one of the historically strongest biases in the history of photography. Since its invention, photography has been described or wilfully constructed as a key witness to a passing moment or event, and has enduringly been conceptualized as what Innis (1964) referred to as a 'time-biased' medium. This fundamental feature of photography is being profoundly transformed through digital photographic mapping, where one photograph (and I wonder if this is still the proper name to indicate what this image is) is able to seamlessly merge many photographs of contiguous places taken at different times. This synthesized image, as the single photographs that compose it is still a visible token of the past; but as a combination of contiguous photographs, it is also a combination of past present and future, as the photographs that it merges together represent the present, past or future to one another. This new digital photographic map transforms a time-space unicum (the photograph taken at a specific time, in a specific place) into a fractured time within a space continuum (a composed photographic image that merges different times and connects contiguous spaces)".

What can one infer from the paragraph above?

A:-Digital photographs are chemically constituted which gives them a continuous tone

Question87:-Answer the questions below the paragraph :

Culture makers from Africa, Asia, and Latin America, like all modernists, produced art from inside the era's profound axiological shift from tradition to futurity.. Understood as an oppositional, alienated, or autonomous posture towards the status quo of establishment culture and society, the historical avant-garde is associated with groups of young artists and writers who stood together as individuals to transform the given independent van guard magazines formed to publish their poetry, cultural commentary, and signature manifestos : Takahashi Shinkichi's "Assertion is Dadaist" (1923, Tokyo); "The Storm Society Manifesto", signed by Ni Yide, Pang Xunqin, et.al. (1932, Shanghai); Oswald de Andrade's "Cannibalist Manifesto" (1928 São Paulo); and Uche Okeke's "Natural Synthesis" (1960, Zaria, Nigeria). Roughly synonymous with the "cutting edge" of a modernity presumed to be advancing, that edge that cut countless way was honed on hope and a shared belief in the power of art and the ethical role of the artist in society. Since each artist was by definition experimental and individualist, since each vision and situation was unique, the question of what it means to be avant-garde has drawn a range of responses across time and place.

Question89:-Answer the questions based on the paragraph below

The institution of the museum came to India as part of the vast knowledge-creating project of the Raj. The intention of early British museums that took India as their subject was to 'present to the eye a typical collection of facts, illustrations and examples which... will give a concise synopsis of India - of the country and its material products - of the people and their moral condition'. The museum collections were to be a metonym for the land, presenting all the pertinent information about India through an inventory of her products, materials and human resources. Moreover, objects in the museum would bear witness to the degree to which India had achieved or fallen short of civilisation, fixing the 'moral status' of the subject race. Accordingly, the first museums that took India as their subject race. (whether in India or in Britain) were encyclopaedic in scope. Gathering science and art under one roof, these museums included scientific, economic, industrial, and archaeological collections. A satisfactory museum needed to possess sections for Natural History, Ethnology, Geology, Archaeology and the Industrial Arts. The museum-as-microcosm was part of the imperial fantasy of being able to create a complete and comprehensive archive of the Empire, in which a correctly classified and labelled array of samples could adequately represent the imperial domain.
